Stories from Real Life

Dr. Murray Bowen wrote, “The person who acquires a little ability at becoming an observer, and at controlling some of his emotional reactivity acquires an ability that is useful for life in all kinds of emotional snarls.” Dr. Bowen recognized that by telling the story of his own observations and the efforts he made to engage more thoughtfully in his family, work, and social relationships, the ideas of Bowen family systems theory became “alive and real” to others. Possibilities for managing life’s real life challenges became a little clearer.

Princeton Family Center for Education is inviting you to a 90 minute webcast, Stories From Real Life, on Friday, May 13, from 10:00 AM to 11:30 AM. Selden Dunbar Illick, Kathy Wiseman, and Julie Bergdahl describe some compelling circumstances that required thought, creativity, and action. Please join us in hearing some stories of individual efforts to be a little more thoughtful in the process of navigating real life. These efforts, informed by the ideas of Bowen family systems theory, provided more choices for moving through real life circumstances a little more comfortably. The hope is that these stories will help to make the theory “alive and real” for you too!
